Abstract

Family always maintains its importance as a social reality. The role of mothers, an important factor in family sociology, has undergone significant changes in the postmodern period. Beyond the identity of a classical mother, motherhood in the postmodern era has a professional nature. With the rapid development of information technologies, information has transformed into a commodity. With the consumption of information, the field and boundaries of expertise have expanded and motherhood has moved from the private sphere to the public sphere. Nowadays, middle-class women attribute a different meaning to their child when the mother's identity is being reconstructed. This paper aims to comprehend the cultural constructs of motherhood. It reviews the book The Sociology of New Motherhood: Being a Mother in Postmodern Times.
